Not illustrated. 1887 Excerpt: .but ordinary men would have no sufficient spur to contemplation of them. The fact of spiritual immortality could thus hardly be revealed but by association with physical mortality. I hold that our consciousness is not that of dying beings, but of eternal ones; and this is the strongest proof of immortality. But it. would never be challenged--at least not supremely--were there not this ever recurring experience, counterfeiting annihilation and compelling men s souls to recognize the form of their own self-consciousness. It is good sometimes, says a quaint old Englishman, to smell to a lock of fresh earth; and so it helps us sometimes to be reminded of our mortality. This is not merely, or mostly, because death s associations shock and alarm men--frighten them into virtue and religion--but because they call attention, as I have said, to the real question of their being. It is because death tests and so quickens faith Faith is the vision, the self-interpretation of the soul. But the common incidents of life, I say, are not enough to make faith s work important to us. Though it is all-important, yet it would have an imperfect sphere amid the pettinesses f unending earthly life. But death trips away all integuments and all disguises from our selfhood. Love will lave its answer--whither has my loved no gone? Self will have its answer--what shall death do to me? Think what we should be had we never struggled with these problems! Think what it...
