As one more example, the purified, washed Tsujichuchi, which forms 70 per cent, of the egg-shell body, may be brought to a like relation, differing from shirolite by 2(SiOsHsO); thus--O1 Sii9Al11FeNa4.0HsO. No intrinsic importance is attached to these empirical formulations, per se. They are merely interesting and convenient, as representing equivalent relations. With regard, however, to certain studies of the molecular volumes of these minerals, in connection with those of the porcelains, these formula; have an essential importance. To forward such studies, with which I lie writer is greatly occupied, much care has been given to density-determinations of all these substances. But this branch of the subject is far from ripe for presentation in this report. 9. Analyses of Chinese and European Porcelains.--No pretence of completeness can be made for the following table; but some of...
